Operating from Athens, Spec Media Greece works with clients via scheduled online sessions.

According to the company, the Alexis Sophos method combines elements of spiritual reflection, personal coaching and practical communication strategies. The goal is not to provide psychological therapy or legal advice, but to offer additional perspective when people feel stuck in recurring emotional patterns.

"Many of our clients contact us when a relationship has broken down and they no longer know how to approach a calm conversation with their former partner," says Alexis Sophos, the consultant whose name the method carries. "We focus on helping them understand what actually happened, what they truly want going forward, and how they can communicate that more clearly."

The consulting process usually begins with an initial analysis session. In this conversation, the current situation, the history of the relationship and the client's expectations are discussed. Based on this assessment, Spec Media Greece outlines possible next steps – which can include further one-on-one sessions, written guidance or structured follow-up calls over a defined period.

Rather than promising specific outcomes, the company emphasizes realistic expectations and transparent communication. "We do not guarantee that a former partner will return or that a particular outcome will happen within a fixed timeframe," Sophos explains. "What we can offer is a focused process that helps people regain orientation, emotional stability and a clearer view of their options."

Clients in the United States can book sessions online, with appointment times adapted to different time zones. According to Spec Media Greece, many people prefer remote consulting because it allows them to speak openly from their own environment, without the pressure of an in-person office visit.

The company also highlights that its work is intended to complement, not replace, professional mental-health or legal support. Individuals who are experiencing severe psychological distress, domestic violence or complex legal issues are encouraged to contact qualified professionals in those fields. Spec Media Greece positions its services as an additional spiritual and emotional resource for people who wish to reflect on their relationships and personal choices.

With the U.S. expansion, Spec Media Greece plans to participate in international conferences and online events related to spirituality, relationships and personal development. The company states that it will continue to adapt its communication and service structure to comply with local regulations and industry standards in the countries where it operates.
