“This neighborhood shaped who I am,” O'Connor said. “Being able to return here and open an office where my family lived, learned, and worked means everything to me. Brooklyn deserves strong advocates who understand its people and its history, and I'm honored to bring our firm's services back to the place that raised me.”

O'Connor Injury Law has refined experience in representing sanitation workers, teachers, transit employees, and other municipal workers who are injured while serving the city. These cases often involve complex legal requirements—such as strict filing deadlines and specialized rules for claims involving city agencies—making experienced representation essential.

While the firm is deeply familiar with municipal worker cases, O'Connor Injury Law serves clients across a full range of personal injury matters. Over his career, O'Connor has recovered more than 25 million dollars for injured New Yorkers, representing individuals harmed in motor vehicle accidents, premises liability incidents, municipal negligence cases, construction accidents, and more.
