Although the EB-5 program continues to grow in popularity, many investors remain uncertain about whether they personally qualify. Global Immigration Partners' new resource addresses the most common concerns and dispels widespread misconceptions.

The guide answers frequently asked questions such as:

Do I need business experience?
No. EB-5 does not require prior business ownership or management experience, particularly for Regional Center investors.

Do I need to speak English?
No. There is no English-language requirement, and applicants may use translators or certified translations as needed.

Do I need to live in the same state as my EB-5 project?
No. Investors may reside anywhere in the United States regardless of where their investment project is located.

Does prior visa rejection matter?
In most cases, no. A previous visa denial does not automatically disqualify an investor unless it involved serious immigration, criminal, or security issues.

"Many investors wrongly assume they must have business expertise or be fluent in English to qualify," said Alexander Jovy, Co-Managing Partner at Global Immigration Partners. "Our goal with this guide is to clearly explain the EB-5 program's actual requirements so families can make informed decisions about their immigration options."

The guide also outlines the fundamental EB-5 criteria, including required investment amounts, lawful source-of-funds documentation, and the creation of 10 full-time U.S. jobs.

The full article is now available on the Global Immigration Partners website and is part of the firm's mission to provide transparent, accessible guidance to investors around the world.
