Natural stones, despite their high costs, convey a sense of luxury. Another important factor is that no two marble or granite countertops are alike, thus making them unique. Furthermore, installing granite or marble in master bathrooms will not just offer the vanity top a modern, luxurious appearance but also draw buyers during resale. Similarly, vanity tops fabricated from another natural stone quartzite, are incredibly robust and easy to maintain. So anytime a user wish to add luxury to their bathrooms, they should opt for a natural stone. However, for family bathrooms seeing a lot of traffic, alternatives like engineered stones could prove to have an upper edge over natural stones. Despite being a good option, a natural stone needs more upkeep and periodic healing.

Quartz are a popular option among homebuyers given their high resale value. Vanity countertops in quartz are made with an amalgamation of 70 to 90% ground-up quartz and other stone minerals, along with resins and pigments. Available in many styles, some almost identical to natural stones have integrated sink basins, thus making them the most ideal choice for consumers with economic budgets for renovations. Furthermore, their durability, lesser brittleness, and non-porous nature make them stain-resistant. These properties aid quartz to fit in bathrooms needing a contemporary look or for family bathrooms with a lot of use. However, almost seaming apparent, quartz lacks natural stone's heat resistance. Thus, it becomes extremely important to select the right stone for vanity countertops post gauging their pros and cons.
