

Speaking for Victims: Veteran Advocate Outlines 2026 Vision for Victim-Centred Justice

Former Scotland Yard detective reveals how justice systems designed for institutional efficiency re-traumatize those they claim to serve.

LONDON, ENGLAND, UNITED KINGDOM, December 23, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- While policy makers debate abstract criminal justice reforms, those directly impacted by crime remain largely unheard in the conversations shaping their futures. Chukwudum Ikeazor, whose motto "Speaking for the victims, Fighting for the forgotten" emerged from 30 years of frontline police work and victim advocacy, argues that 2026 must be the year victim voices move from periphery to centre of justice reform.

"The ultimate measure of any justice system isn't its efficiency or even its fairness, it is whether victims feel heard, protected, and restored," states Ikeazor, Anne Frank Moral Courage Award recipient and strategic advisor now accessible through <http://chukwudum.org>.

"We've built elaborate systems around victims while rarely asking what they actually need."

Having served two decades with the Metropolitan Police and worked across continents, Ikeazor brings uncommon credibility: someone who has investigated serious crimes, supported countless victims through traumatic processes, and later advised organisations on creating genuinely victim-centred approaches.

Recent studies reveal troubling gaps: victims report feeling re-traumatised by systems meant to help them, abandoned during lengthy proceedings, and unsupported after verdicts are reached. Ikeazor identifies these failures as structural, not accidental.

Professional victim support environments prioritise dignity and restoration over institutional efficiency

"The current approach asks victims to fit into processes designed for institutional convenience," Ikeazor explains. "Genuine victim-centredness requires reversing that designing processes around victim wellbeing, dignity, and actual needs. This isn't soft sentiment; it's strategic effectiveness. Victims who feel supported engage better with investigations, testimony holds up stronger, and communities rebuild trust in justice itself."

His comprehensive victim support framework addresses three critical phases often neglected:

Immediate Crisis Response: Trauma-informed support from first contact

Process Navigation: Active guidance through complex legal proceedings

Post-Resolution Support: Continued care regardless of case outcome

"As we enter 2026, progressive organisations from police forces to victim support charities to legal practices are seeking guidance on truly centring victims," Ikeazor observes. "The question isn't whether victim-centred justice is ideal; it's how to systematically implement it in ways that serve both justice and healing."

Modern justice systems must measure success by victim restoration, not just case efficiency

Organisations serious about victim advocacy are already engaging strategic guidance on transforming rhetoric into operational reality. The New Year offers a powerful symbolic moment: will justice systems continue speaking about victims, or finally learn to listen?

Justice systems designed around institutional convenience rather than victim dignity don't just fail victims—they re-traumatize them. That's not a design flaw. That's a design choice."
