The recorded keynote was developed through cross-functional collaboration across UAGC and shared with conference attendees as part of Mohammed First University academic programming. The presentation explored the role of connection, collaboration, and soft skills such as communication, adaptability, and purpose-driven leadership in preparing learners for success in today’s global workforce.

The keynote was led by UAGC faculty member Bill Davis and featured contributions from colleagues across student affairs and advising, including brief segments focused on career readiness, military-affiliated student support, and international perspectives. The collaborative format reflected a team-based approach to student engagement and institutional leadership.

“This keynote was an opportunity to share how a culture of care, collaboration, and purposeful connection can positively influence student outcomes,” said Davis. “The experience also reflected how the University of Arizona Global Campus brings together faculty and staff expertise to create meaningful, real-world impact beyond the classroom.”

Conference organizer Fatima-Zahra Zouali, a researcher and faculty member at Mohammed First University, expressed appreciation for the presentation and the collaborative approach behind it, noting the passion, energy, and sense of purpose conveyed throughout the keynote.

The presentation also highlighted research-informed perspectives on durable skills development, including work recently published through IGI Global Publications. This work underscores a commitment to academic scholarship and applied learning.

Participation in the international conference reflects a broader mission to expand access to quality education, support student success, and engage in global academic dialogue around teaching, learning, and workforce preparation.
