Group has filed a lawsuit on behalf of the family of a union ironworker who tragically lost his life while working at a construction site in Joliet, Illinois. The fatal incident occurred on December 15, 2025 at the future home of Boulevard Place - a Costco-anchored retail development located on the northwest side of the I-55 and US Route 30 interchange.

The lawsuit seeks accountability for what the family alleges were preventable safety failures that led to the ironworker's death.

Construction work is inherently dangerous, but workers have the right to expect that proper safety protocols, training, and oversight will be in place. According to the complaint, Thomas "Tom" Kircher, an ironworker and member of Ironworkers #444, was performing job-related duties when the incident occurred. Emergency responders were called to the scene, but the worker ultimately succumbed to his injuries.

Kircher is survived by two sons, Alexander and Joseph Kircher, for whom the loss is devastating — emotionally and financially. In addition to the immeasurable personal grief, families often face sudden uncertainty about income, benefits, and long-term stability.

Illinois law provides important protections for construction workers and their families. When a workplace death occurs, surviving family members have the right to pursue legal claims beyond workers' compensation, particularly when negligence by third parties is involved.
