Why Think and Amia Are Rising in 2026

Across hybrid organizations and creative studios, users are gravitating toward chairs that deliver dependable lumbar support, adaptable fit, and long-wear comfort. Think and Amia meet those criteria with distinct approaches: Think emphasizes adaptive, body-responsive support that moves with the user. At the same time, Amia is known for all-day comfort anchored by consistent lower-back reinforcement. Both models ship in configurations that satisfy a wide range of desk heights, body types, and daily tasks.

- Steelcase Think: adaptive back support, intuitive recline, available with 3D knit back options, and adjustable arms for fine-tuned fit.
- Steelcase Amia: reinforced lower-back support, flexible seat edge for pressure relief, available in multiple base finishes and arm configurations.

As organizations standardize on fewer, more versatile seating SKUs, these chairs have emerged as value leaders for individual focus work, shared hoteling stations, and on-camera collaboration needs.

Inventory Highlights and Pricing Snapshots

Madison Seating's Steelcase collection includes rotating stock across colors, frames, and arm configurations. While inventory changes frequently, recent examples on the collection page include:

- Steelcase Reply Mesh: discounts up to approximately 72% off select configurations.

Quality, Value, and Transparent Access

The expanded selection emphasizes verified quality and value, pairing premium components with transparent, published pricing. Open-box and refurbished models provide an accessible path to top-tier ergonomics for startups and SMBs outfitting shared spaces, as well as individual professionals upgrading a home setup. For facilities teams, consolidating on Think and Amia can simplify maintenance, training, and parts planning while maintaining high user support.

Availability and How to Compare

Because open-box and refurbished lots can sell quickly, the best way to compare models and configurations is to review what's in stock on the collection page and filter by price, material, color, or arm options. For bulk purchases, facilities teams can align timelines and quantities with replenishment windows to secure consistent sets across hoteling stations, conference rooms, and individual workpoints.
