During a wide-ranging 50-minute interview on the IncomelInsider TV podcast and YouTube channel, Plume highlighted what he believes are the most common red flags in the precious metals industry, particularly aggressive promotions promising $10,000 to $20,000 in “free silver.”

Any company handling your retirement savings should respect that you want to take your time.”

“If a company says they’re going to give you $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000 in free silver, that’s a massive red flag,” Plume explained. “Nobody can just give away anything. What they’re doing is marking up their coins 50 to 60 percent or more. It looks like a great deal, but it’s really a bait and switch.”

The “Free Silver” Illusion

According to Plume, promotional silver offers are often funded by excessive markups on coins and other metals inside a retirement account. While the marketing language suggests a generous bonus, the actual cost may be hidden in inflated pricing.

Instead of focusing on giveaways, Plume encourages retirement savers to carefully examine pricing transparency, dealer reputation, and long-term value.

High-Pressure Sales Tactics: Another Major Warning Sign

Plume also cautioned against companies that rush consumers into immediate decisions.

“If they’re telling you the offer expires today, or they’re using scare tactics, or making you feel like you’ll miss out if you don’t act now, that’s a red flag,” he said. “Any company handling your retirement savings should respect that you want to take your time.”

He compared aggressive sales tactics to a “used car type of vibe,” urging buyers to step back if they feel pressured.

Due Diligence Matters

For Americans considering rolling over retirement savings into precious metals, Plume offered straightforward guidance:

Check a company’s rating with the Better Business Bureau (BBB)

Read verified customer reviews

Spend time speaking with representatives

Build a relationship before making a decision

Never rush a retirement investment

“Ultimately, if you’ve worked hard for your money, you should take your time,” Plume said. “Spend time reading about the company. If you do that, you’ll typically do okay.”

A Growing Concern in the Gold IRA Industry

With continued volatility in financial markets and increased interest in physical gold and silver, more Americans are exploring self-directed retirement accounts backed by precious metals. As demand rises, Plume warned that so do questionable marketing tactics.
