Pristine Jet Charter, a Dubai-based private aviation brokerage, has reported a sharp but short-lived surge in demand for private jet charter services across the United Arab Emirates and wider Gulf region following recent regional airspace disruptions.

We saw a sharp rise in enquiries initially, followed by a clear stabilisation as confidence returned and clients resumed normal travel behaviour.”

According to the company, demand for private aviation increased significantly in the immediate aftermath of the situation, as commercial flight uncertainty and airspace restrictions prompted travellers to seek alternative solutions.

“We experienced a substantial increase in enquiries during the initial phase. For approximately the first ten days, we were receiving in excess of 100 enquiries per day, driven largely by urgent travel requirements by seasoned air charter fliers and first-time private jet users seeking certainty,” said Zaher Deir, Managing Director of Pristine Jet Charter.

This surge in demand was primarily driven by travellers seeking flexibility, reliability, and control over their travel plans, particularly on key routes between the Gulf, Europe, and regional destinations.

However, while demand rose sharply, the number of completed charter flights did not increase at the same rate. Ongoing airspace restrictions, operational limitations, and aircraft repositioning challenges contributed to a reduction in overall flight activity across the region.

At the same time, charter pricing saw a notable increase. Limited aircraft availability, extended routing due to airspace restrictions, war risk insurance premiums, and heightened demand resulted in higher charter costs, particularly on routes between the Gulf and Europe.

As the situation evolved, the market began to stabilise.

“As clarity improved and residents across the UAE became more reassured, we saw a gradual return to normal patterns of flight activity. People resumed their everyday routines, and confidence in air travel began to recover,” added Zaher Deir.

He continued:

“The UAE authorities have demonstrated a high level of preparedness and effectiveness in managing the situation, which has contributed to maintaining stability and confidence within the country. This has played an important role in normalising demand after the initial surge.”

Following the first ten days, Pristine Jet Charter confirms that enquiry levels have now returned to more typical market trends, reflecting a more stable operating environment.

Despite the short-term volatility, the longer-term outlook for private aviation in the Gulf remains strong. The UAE and Saudi Arabia continue to be key growth markets, supported by sustained demand from corporate, government, and ultra-high-net-worth clients.

The recent events have further reinforced the role of private aviation as a flexible and reliable alternative during periods of uncertainty.
