faculty have contributed from the USA, Ireland, Indonesia, and Malaysia. This multinational faculty participation has helped expand the fellowship beyond a conventional online course into a truly international academic platform in pain medicine.

According to Daradia, the continued growth of the fellowship reflects the increasing need for structured and clinically relevant pain education for practicing physicians. Chronic pain remains a major global health burden, and many doctors seek practical training that bridges theory with real-world decision-making. The fellowship has been designed to address that gap through systematic teaching, faculty guidance, and clinically meaningful discussions.

The online pain medicine fellowship is part of Daradia's broader mission to improve pain education, practice, and research through focused academic initiatives. Daradia: The Pain Clinic, based in Kolkata, India, has built a strong reputation in pain medicine through physician training, clinical practice, research activities, and educational innovation.
