Public sector agencies responsible for corrections, justice, health, and human services face growing pressure to meet rising demands with limited resources. Many still rely on fragmented systems and manual processes that restrict visibility, delay decision making, and complicate coordination.

"This partnership helps agencies move beyond outdated systems by modernizing mission critical capabilities in a practical, phased way," said Chris O'Brien, Partner and Communities, Energy & Infrastructure Leader at Guidehouse. "By aligning technology with improved ways of working, we help agencies reduce implementation risk while delivering measurable improvements in operational performance and program outcomes."

Through this partnership, Guidehouse and Vant4ge combine operational expertise with a modern, AI enabled platform to transform how agencies work. The collaboration helps unify data across systems, reduce administrative burden, and equip frontline staff and leadership with actionable insights that support more informed, consistent decisions.

Vant4ge's flagship platform, Vant4gePoint, enables agencies to unify data, automate workflows, and apply advanced analytics to support operational and clinical decision making. Together with Vant4gePoint, AIDA, a patent-pending agentic AI-powered interview platform, ensures efficiency, consistency, and accuracy in data acquisition. When combined with Guidehouse's advisory, implementation, and change management capabilities, the partnership provides a comprehensive approach to modernization that addresses both technology deployment and organizational readiness.

“Corrections and human services agencies have been asked to solve complex, deeply human problems with tools that were never built for them. This partnership gives agencies something they rarely have: a credible, structured path from where they are to where they need to be,” said Sean Hosman, CEO, Vant4ge.

“The agencies we work with aren't looking for another vendor relationship. They are seeking partners who understand the operational realities of public sector work and can translate technology capability into real, measurable gains on the ground. That is what this partnership is built to do,” said Jim Gilliam, Vice President of Business Development, Vant4ge.

Together, Guidehouse and Vant4ge will support public sector clients across a range of priorities, including:

- Coordinating care and case management through cross agency visibility supported by unified data
- Reducing administrative burden by automating manual processes that consume staff time and create inconsistency
- Strengthening decision-making through real-time analytics, AI-driven insights, and unified data platforms
- Modernizing legacy systems with scalable, secure, interoperable technology
- Equipping frontline staff with tools to support better assessments, case management, and coordination

The partnership reflects a shared commitment to responsible modernization, ensuring that technology investments lead to lasting improvements in how agencies operate to enhance outcomes for the individuals and communities they serve.
