NEW YORK — Across America, Jewish families are preparing for a Shabbat many say feels deeply personal and emotional.

Ahead of America's 250th anniversary celebrations, Shabbat250Kit.com is delivering curated Shabbat experiences nationwide, helping families reconnect with the warmth, peace, and meaning of Friday night traditions.

Organizers say the response has already been emotional.

One woman from New Jersey shared this week that she had not lit Shabbat candles in nearly 60 years — but plans to light them again this Friday night.

For some grandparents, it is a return to memories of the Shabbat tables they grew up with decades ago.

For children and grandchildren who never experienced a traditional Shabbat themselves, this weekend may become their first opportunity to understand the atmosphere and traditions they heard about from parents and grandparents.

Young Jewish Americans across the country are also expressing growing excitement around the movement, saying they want to experience for themselves the peace, connection, and meaning associated with Shabbat.

Shabbat250Kit.com offers nationwide Shabbat packages containing traditional Friday night essentials, including challah, candles, grape juice, Kiddush items, prepared foods, and other Shabbat necessities designed to help families create a meaningful Friday night experience at home.

Each package also includes a complimentary easy-to-follow Shabbat guide explaining the Friday night experience step-by-step, including candle lighting, Kiddush, washing for bread, Hamotzi, and the traditional blessings and customs of the evening.

The initiative was created as a warm national experience centered around family, unity, tradition, and hospitality.

"In a world moving faster every day, people are searching for something real," organizers said.

"For one evening, families across America will pause together around the same candles, blessings, and table."
