Locardi said the company's mission extends beyond devices and software.

"I've always believed our real purpose is to help people see, preserve, and share life more beautifully and truthfully," said Locardi. "Supporting AMF lets us stand at the crossroads of technology and genuine human experience, which is exactly where I feel Radiant does its best work."

Festival organizers said the sponsorship represents a significant step forward for the growing event, which launched in 2025 and continues to expand its regional and national visibility.

"Having Radiant Imaging Labs join America's Mountain Festival as our Title Sponsor is a tremendous statement about where this event is headed," said Derek Waggoner, founder of America's Mountain Festival and CEO of the Tava Investor Group. "Radiant represents innovation, creativity, and authenticity — values that align perfectly with our vision for the festival. We are proud to partner with a globally recognized technology company that understands the importance of community, live music, and creating unforgettable experiences for our guests here in Woodland Park."

The festival's location in Woodland Park and its backdrop of Pikes Peak were also key factors in the partnership.

"What really stands out about America's Mountain Festival is its character," said Locardi. "It's not trying to be generic or overproduced — it owns its sense of place, identity, and real connection to the audience."

Locardi added that the company sees live entertainment, storytelling, and technology as increasingly interconnected. Florian Schuster, a prominent figure in the European photo industry and managing director of Imaging Media House Germany, is a co-founder of Radiant Imaging Labs alongside Elia Locardi and Rich Harrington.

"Live entertainment creates emotion, storytelling gives that emotion meaning, and technology gives us the power to preserve and share it," he said. "At Radiant, I believe technology should serve storytelling, never overshadow it."

Jenna Paulette, Tyce Delk, Matt Skinner Band and Kenya Reese (2026 Songwriters Competition winner)
