flagship location in Pecos, Texas. This expansion comes as West Texas, and Reeves County in particular, continues to attract significant investment in digital infrastructure projects, creating demand for thousands of skilled construction workers and the housing needed to support them. Armadillo is particularly well positioned to benefit from this significant market demand due to its experience building, owning and operating workforce housing facilities for corporate customers in the West Texas region, as well as its substantial inventory of modular housing units and kitchen/dining/recreation buildings which are immediately available for use on such projects.

"These agreements reflect our commitment to supporting the workforce behind some of the most significant infrastructure investments happening in America today," said Michael Maloney, President of Armadillo Workforce Housing. "As data center development accelerates, our team is prepared to provide the housing, services, and logistical support needed to help these projects succeed. We are proud to play a role in powering the growth of the digital economy."
