According to the organization, "Most individuals diagnosed with mesothelioma are aware that compensation may be available through asbestos-related trust funds. However, we believe that many to most people who develop lung cancer because of occupational asbestos exposure may not realize they could also qualify for substantial financial compensation. Compensation for an individual with

The Mesothelioma Victims Center notes that former auto-truck mechanics who routinely worked with asbestos-containing brakes, clutches, transmissions, and related automotive components before the early 1980s may have experienced significant workplace exposure to asbestos.

"We are committed to helping people who have developed mesothelioma or asbestos-related lung cancer understand their options and pursue the compensation they deserve," said a spokesperson for the Mesothelioma Victims Center. "Many auto mechanics worked daily with products that contained asbestos, often without knowing the health risks associated with that exposure."

The organization says mechanics may have worked in a variety of settings, including gas stations, commercial brake and tire shops, municipal vehicle maintenance facilities, and military motor pools throughout the United States.

The Mesothelioma Victims Center emphasizes that it is not a law firm, but an advocacy organization focused on connecting individuals with experienced attorneys who handle asbestos-related cases nationwide.

"Our goal is to help patients and families gain direct access to highly qualified legal representation," the spokesperson added. "We want to help ensure that individuals affected by asbestos exposure have the opportunity to pursue compensation and obtain the resources they need if a person like this would call us at 866-714-6466."

Occupations historically associated with elevated asbestos exposure include Navy veterans, power plant workers, shipyard workers, steel mill workers, refinery workers, factory workers, plumbers, electricians, welders, pipefitters, millwrights, miners, auto mechanics, machinists, paper mill workers, printers, firefighters, railroad workers, and construction workers.

Many individuals diagnosed with mesothelioma or lung cancer today were exposed to asbestos decades ago, often during the 1950s through the 1980s. Because mesothelioma and asbestos-related lung cancer can have long latency periods, symptoms may not appear until many years after exposure.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) has identified several states with historically higher incidences of mesothelioma and lung cancer, including Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Virginia, Michigan, Illinois, Minnesota, Louisiana, Washington, and Oregon.

According to the Mesothelioma Victims Center, calls received over the past two decades indicate that individuals affected by mesothelioma and asbestos exposure lung cancer live throughout the United States, including states such as New York, Florida, California, Texas, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, Idaho, and Alaska.

Former mechanics, workers, veterans, and family members seeking additional information about asbestos-related illnesses and potential compensation options are welcome to contact the Mesothelioma Victims Center anytime at 866-714-6466.
