For many people experiencing substance use or mental health crises, emergency departments often become the first point of stabilization. Banyan’s model is designed to connect that moment of crisis to sustained, structured treatment and long-term recovery support.

That work depends on nursing teams that are ready to receive patients from the moment they arrive, with the same standard of care regardless of which facility, which shift, or how a patient enters treatment. Randle’s appointment and her own background as an emergency department nurse earlier in her career position her to help lead that effort across Banyan’s national network.

“My goal is to create a nursing culture where excellence is the standard and support is the expectation. I want our nurses to have the education, leadership, and clear clinical standards they need to provide exceptional patient care with confidence.”

With Randle’s appointment, Banyan is reinforcing a system-wide commitment to consistent nursing standards, clinical accountability, and high-quality care across every level of treatment.
