

Ellen Haynes, Recognized By Influential Women, Serves As A Dedicated Student Researcher At San Jacinto College

CARRIZO SPRINGS, TX, UNITED STATES, July 13, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Advancing the Study of Women's Roles in Military and Texas History While Championing Historical Accuracy, Inclusion, and Representation

Carrizo Springs, Texas – Ellen Haynes is an emerging historian, researcher, and aspiring military intelligence professional whose work is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten stories of women who have shaped history. As a student researcher at San Jacinto College, Ellen specializes in women's roles in military history and underrepresented narratives within Texas history, bringing renewed attention to individuals whose contributions have often been overlooked or omitted from traditional historical accounts.

Since Fall 2025, Ellen has devoted her academic research to examining the lives of women whose achievements have remained largely absent from historical literature. Her commitment to historical accuracy and inclusive scholarship culminated in her research paper, Literary Segregation and the Lost Women of Texas History, which explores the stories of 13 women who played significant roles during the Texas Revolution but have received limited recognition in mainstream historical narratives.

Her research will be presented at the Great Plains Honors Council Conference in March 2026 and the San Jacinto College Honors Symposium in May 2026. Ellen is currently seeking publication of the paper, reflecting her ongoing commitment to expanding historical scholarship and ensuring overlooked voices receive the recognition they deserve.

For Ellen, history is more than documenting events—it is about restoring voices that have been forgotten. She believes preserving these stories creates a richer, more complete understanding of the past while promoting greater equity and representation in historical research.

Before focusing on women's military history, Ellen built a strong academic foundation through dual-credit coursework at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. There, she developed research skills that combined historical inquiry with theological scholarship, learning how to communicate complex ideas in ways that are both academically rigorous and accessible to broader audiences.

Outside the classroom, Ellen has gained valuable professional experience through customer service, education, and campus leadership roles. She has served as a Customer Service Representative with PFS Group, a Marketplace Assistant at San Jacinto College, and a Volunteer Secretary for the Hispanic Culture Club. These experiences strengthened her communication, organizational, and leadership skills while reinforcing the importance of collaboration, professionalism, and serving diverse communities.

As a second-generation college student, Ellen's educational journey has been made possible through scholarships and grants. She considers these opportunities both a privilege and a responsibility, motivating her to pursue academic excellence while opening doors for future generations.

In addition to her academic pursuits, Ellen has entered the Delayed Entry Program with the United States Air Force and plans to build a career in military intelligence. Looking ahead, she intends to earn a doctorate in history and pursue a career as a research historian and archivist, specializing in preserving the stories of overlooked women in military history.

Her long-term goal is to combine military service with historical scholarship, helping ensure that women whose contributions have been forgotten are properly documented and remembered for generations to come.

Ellen attributes her success first and foremost to her faith in God. She believes every opportunity she has received is the result of His guidance and provision, placing her exactly where she is meant to be. Her faith serves as the foundation for both her personal life and academic pursuits. It provides direction, purpose, and confidence that she is following the path God has prepared for her.

The best career advice Ellen has received is to remain persistent and trust the research process, particularly when valuable information appears difficult—or even impossible—to locate. She believes some of the most meaningful discoveries occur when researchers continue searching after others have stopped. Rather than becoming discouraged by obstacles, Ellen views them as opportunities to dig deeper and ask new questions.

That philosophy has shaped her own research. When historical sources seem inaccessible or incomplete, she believes the challenge itself often points toward important gaps in the historical record that deserve greater attention.

Ellen encourages young women entering historical research to pursue subjects they genuinely care about and remain committed even when progress seems slow. She advises aspiring researchers to take breaks when necessary, return with a fresh perspective, and remain curious about why certain information is difficult to find. Those unanswered questions, she believes, frequently lead to the most meaningful discoveries. For Ellen, persistence and intellectual curiosity are among the most valuable qualities a researcher can possess.

She believes one of the greatest challenges facing historians today is the accessibility of historical information. Countless valuable documents remain buried within archives, private collections, or museums that have not yet digitized their materials, making important sources difficult to locate.

Access often depends on networking, building professional relationships, and connecting with individuals who can provide access to specialized collections or unpublished records.

Fortunately, Ellen also sees tremendous opportunity in collaboration.

Because women's military history remains a relatively specialized field, researchers often share common interests and are willing to support one another. Through conferences and academic events, Ellen has already experienced how networking can create opportunities to connect with respected historians and authors whose work aligns closely with her own.

She believes these professional relationships will continue to strengthen historical scholarship by encouraging collaboration, expanding access to research materials, and uncovering stories that might otherwise remain hidden.

The values guiding Ellen's life begin with honesty, integrity, and loyalty. She believes personal and professional growth starts with honesty, followed by the wisdom to act with integrity and treat others with fairness, respect, and compassion. For Ellen, loyalty means remaining true to her principles, even when others may disagree, provided those disagreements do not involve fundamental questions of ethics.

She is also deeply committed to gender and racial equality. Through her research, Ellen works to amplify voices that have historically been overlooked, believing every individual deserves recognition for their contributions regardless of gender or background. By uncovering forgotten stories and preserving historical truth, she hopes to contribute to a more complete, inclusive, and accurate understanding of history while giving a voice to those who can no longer tell their own stories.

Outside of her academic work, Ellen enjoys reading, painting, crafting, and spending time building meaningful relationships with clients, colleagues, classmates, and members of her community. These creative interests provide balance to her scholarly pursuits while reflecting her appreciation for lifelong learning, artistic expression, and human connection.

As she continues her education, prepares for military service, and advances her historical research, Ellen Haynes remains committed to preserving overlooked stories, expanding historical understanding, and ensuring that the women who helped shape history are no longer left out of it.
