Technology entrepreneur, author and investor Satish Jha will deliver the keynote address titled "Roots Before Runway: Building Companies That Don't Need an Exit Strategy."

Jha, founder of AI-powered education platform Edufront and former chief information officer at Hoffmann-La Roche in Basel, is expected to discuss building companies with enduring value rather than pursuing short-term growth strategies.

“True innovation doesn’t happen by trying to fit neatly into someone else’s pre-baked thesis; it happens when you build something with foundational grit,” Jha told the American Bazaar.

“I hope attendees leave realizing that the most resilient architectures are built on enduring value, not just the fleeting gloss of the latest market trend.” Jha also emphasized the importance of investor gatherings in identifying transformative ideas.

“A space like this is a brilliant opportunity to step outside the familiar and expand our horizons,” he said. “The most transformative ideas rarely wear a predictable mask at first glance.”

“Gatherings like the Startup Angel Bazaar are vital because they invite us to align capital with raw, authentic intent, reminding us that our finest investments don’t just yield excellent returns, they help shape the future.”

According to the organizers, the series is designed to create meaningful connections between founders and accredited investors while encouraging discussions around entrepreneurship, innovation and long-term value creation. The Washington event will feature curated networking sessions, founder presentations and discussions on investment opportunities, with organizers positioning the gathering as part of a broader effort to strengthen startup ecosystems across major U.S. innovation hubs.

The events are intended for accredited investors and invited participants seeking to connect with entrepreneurs building scalable ventures across multiple industries.
