the District seek to “age in place” to retain their local community connections,” The Washington Home (TWH) is supporting the DC Village Council Collaboration – a citywide initiative designed to create a stronger, more connected network of Senior Villages across the city.

Villages are grassroots, neighbor-to-neighbor networks that help older adults remain independent, connected, and engaged in the communities they know and love. Through volunteers, partnerships, social activities, transportation, wellness programs, and practical support services, Villages make aging in place both possible.

With a $200,000 TWH-funded investment across 19 partner organizations, the collaboration will support three key areas:

- 1) Shared Services – develop shared administrative services for the 13 DC Villages and 5 incubator and ambassador locations to create administrative efficiencies, reduce costs, and scale programs across the District;
- 2) Data Collection – establish a unified data framework to improve impact reporting capabilities; and
- 3) Service Access – expand the Village movement by launching three new incubator sites, and two new ambassador program sites to increase community outreach capability and deliver village support services in new neighborhoods.

The initiative is part of TWH’s newly redesigned FY26 grant strategy, which shifts funding from isolated intervention programs to prioritizing collective accountability, strategic coordination, and long-term systems change for deeper impact.

In total, TWH has awarded $4.5 million in FY26 grants supporting initiatives across all eight Wards, including collaborations focused on healthcare access, social isolation, workforce development, and aging-in-place supports.

At the center of this collaboration effort is a growing challenge facing older adults in DC: social isolation and limited support services to confidently “age in place” in their current community. The DC Village Council Collaboration is projected to reach approximately 7,609 older adults and increase resources and service locations across the city.

“This collaboration represents a transformative investment in how we support older adults across our communities. By bringing together 19 dedicated partners, we’re strengthening the network of Village organizations that helps older adults remain connected, independent, and engaged where they want to be – in their homes and neighborhoods,” said Crystal Carr Townsend, MPA, CEO of The Washington Home. Together, we’re building shared systems, expanding access to services, and creating a stronger, more sustainable infrastructure that reduces social isolation while ensuring every Village has the tools and partnerships needed to serve residents today and for years to come.”

TWH is proud to partner with these 19 organizations to enhance services across the community Village network so older adults can receive multiple points of support.
