The momentum reflects a simple reality: for appearance-focused automotive shops, the Google Business Profile is the storefront. When a driver searches "ceramic coating near me," Google's map results decide which three shops get the call. Most owners are in the bay running jobs not posting weekly updates, answering reviews, or optimizing photos and categories, which are exactly the signals Google rewards.

Arsenal Industries' service closes that gap with automation.

"We built this expecting a slow ramp. Instead, it took off almost immediately," said Shane, founder of Arsenal Industries. "Coating shops have been burned by agencies charging thousands for vague promises. When they see posts publishing, reviews getting answered, and rankings tracked automatically for less than the profit on a single coating job the decision makes itself. Shops that signed up early are now referring the shop across town."

The growth also tracks a broader shift in local search. Google Maps and AI-driven results increasingly determine which businesses get discovered, and active, complete profiles consistently win that visibility. For high-ticket services like ceramic coating and full-vehicle PPF where customers compare multiple shops before booking that visibility translates directly into booked jobs. In the tight-knit installer community, where shop owners trade notes in forums and Facebook groups, results travel fast.
