FurnitureWiki.org Launches as the Definitive Online Encyclopedia for the Eames Lounge Chair

A new independent encyclopedia site explores every aspect of the Eames Lounge Chair.

MUNICH, GERMANY, September 4, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- FurnitureWiki.org has launched a dedicated, encyclopedia-style resource covering the Eames Lounge Chair (model 670) and its companion ottoman (model 671), the walnut-and-leather armchair designed by Charles and Ray Eames that debuted on American television in 1956 and has remained in continuous production ever since.

The site organizes its coverage into ten in-depth reference pages, each running 2,000 to 4,000 words: History & Origins, Design & Engineering, Materials, Buying Guide, Replicas & Alternatives, Vintage & Collecting, Care & Maintenance, Interior Design, Cultural Impact, and a consolidated Reference & FAQ hub. Together they trace the chair from its molded-plywood engineering and shock-mount construction to its status as a fixture in museum collections and a recurring shorthand for mid-century modern design in film, television, and interiors. "

People searching for information on the Eames Lounge Chair have mostly found scattered retailer pages and forum threads," said a FurnitureWiki.org spokesperson. "We wanted a single, well-sourced reference that treats the chair the way a design encyclopedia would — the history, the materials, how to tell an authentic Herman Miller or Vitra piece from a replica, and what it actually costs to own one."

Built for how people actually search

Each page is structured around real reader questions. Thirty frequently asked questions — covering pricing, authenticity checks, weight capacity, cleaning leather, and the discontinuation of Brazilian rosewood veneer, among other topics — are answered directly on the page and marked up with FAQ structured data.

Every page also carries a captioned image sourced from Wikimedia Commons and Flickr under Creative Commons licensing.

What's next FurnitureWiki.org's team is now working on translations of all content to serve design and furniture market.
