What Do the Washington, DC Market Numbers Say Right Now?

Washington, DC, is currently a somewhat competitive housing market. The median sale price is approximately $695,000, down just 0.77% year over year, while homes are spending a median of 49 days on the market.

Sales activity has increased despite the slight decline in prices. A total of 1,839 homes sold during the latest reporting period, up 7.9% from the previous year. Homes are closing for an average of 99% of their asking price, and approximately 26.6% sell above list price.

At the same time, about 31.2% of listings experience a price reduction, showing that buyers remain selective and that incorrect pricing can lead to longer market times. The most desirable homes can still sell for roughly 1% above asking and go pending in about 21 days.

For buyers, the current market may provide more time to evaluate available properties, but correctly priced homes in sought-after neighborhoods can still attract competition. Sellers should avoid assuming that every property will receive multiple offers and instead build their strategy around current neighborhood-level sales.
