

MOOvers Chicago Launches Public Moving Case Study Series With Real 2026 Job Data

New resource shows how crew size, truck capacity, access, distance and packing needs shaped four completed local and interstate moves.

CHICAGO, IL, UNITED STATES, July 27, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- MOOvers Chicago Inc. today announced the launch of a public moving case study series developed from completed 2026 residential moves. The resource gives Chicago-area consumers concrete examples of how crew size, truck capacity, building access, packing requirements, distance and additional stops can affect the time and planning involved in a move.

The initial series examines four moves ranging from a short local relocation completed in one morning to a two-day interstate move involving a four-bedroom household. Rather than presenting a single average that may not fit a customer's circumstances, the case studies show how the scope and logistics of each job shaped the moving plan.

These case studies show why those details matter. A useful estimate should be based on the actual job, not bedroom count alone.”

President, MOOvers Chicago*

The four examples include:

1. A local move completed in two hours and 30 minutes by a three-person crew using one 24-foot ramp truck. The final paid total was $714.65.

2. A four-bedroom move from Riverside to Naperville with an additional Naperville stop. Packing was scheduled for the day before the move, while moving day was planned with four movers, two trucks and 10 hours of labor.

3. A two-bedroom interstate move from Chicago to Pittsburgh. The estimated 580.5-cubic-foot, 3,975-pound shipment was assigned a three-person crew and one 26-foot truck, with pickup completed in four hours.

4. A four-bedroom interstate move from Okemos, Michigan, to Orland Park, Illinois. The estimated 1,387-cubic-foot, 9,709-pound shipment was handled as a two-day relocation with two 26-foot trucks and a three-person crew.

The complete analysis is available in “Why Moving Times Vary So Much: Four Real Moving Case Studies.”

“People often ask for a moving-time estimate before they have described the stairs, elevators, parking, packing, stops or complete inventory,” said Cezar Daniel Iordan, president of MOOvers Chicago. “These case studies show why those details matter. A useful estimate should be based on the actual job, not bedroom count alone.”

Each case study is based on MOOvers Chicago job records and planning materials. Exact residential addresses are withheld. The examples are educational and should not be treated as fixed price or time promises for a different move. Actual requirements vary according to inventory, access, travel, services, building rules and other conditions.

The case study series builds on the company’s 2025 Chicago Moving Market Intelligence Report, which analyzed 2,599 residential moves totaling $3.74 million across 18 Chicago neighborhoods. While that report examined broader market patterns, the new series focuses on individual jobs and the operational decisions behind them.

MOOvers Chicago plans to add further examples covering apartment moves, high-rise access, packing, storage, commercial relocation and interstate delivery. The goal is to give consumers more useful reference points before they request an estimate and to demonstrate which details help a moving company develop a realistic plan.
