

Pro Movers Miami Issues Hurricane Season Moving Guidance for South Florida

Miami moving company outlines how residents can plan a relocation during peak storm months and verify a mover's federal registration before signing.

Storm season compresses everyone's timeline at once. The customers who do best book early, get rescheduling terms in writing, and photograph everything before it goes on the truck.”

Constantine Shapovalov

planning guidance for South Florida households and businesses scheduling a relocation during the most active stretch of the Atlantic hurricane season. The season runs June 1 through November 30, with activity generally concentrating between mid-August and late September.

Late summer is also when moving volume across Miami-Dade and Broward counties rises. Leases turn over, families try to settle before the school year starts, and closing dates cluster at month-end. That overlap leaves residents booking crews during the same weeks when tropical systems are most likely to affect the region.

The company shared the following recommendations for anyone with a move scheduled between now and the end of the season:

- Book further ahead than usual. Availability tightens quickly once a named storm enters the forecast cone, because residents move their dates up and crews fill. A window of three to four weeks leaves room to reschedule.
- Confirm the rescheduling policy in writing. Ask what happens if a county issues an evacuation order or a building closes its loading dock, and get the answer in the written estimate rather than over the phone.
- Verify federal registration before signing. Any company handling an interstate move must hold an active US DOT number, and consumers can check that number through the FMCSA. Pro Movers Miami operates under US DOT 2855891 and MC 956262.
- Photograph the inventory. Images of furniture, electronics, and any existing damage taken before packing give both sides a clear record if a claim is filed later.
- Ask about storage. Postponed closings are more common during storm months, and knowing whether short-term storage is available, and at what rate, prevents a last-minute scramble.
- Keep a separate essentials box. Identification, insurance documents, medication, chargers, and several days of clothing should travel with the household rather than on the truck.

The company also noted that high-rise buildings across Brickell, Edgewater, and Miami Beach frequently restrict elevator reservations during storm preparation, which can push a move by a full day even when weather does not directly affect the area. Residents in those buildings are advised to confirm freight elevator access with building management at the time of booking rather than during the week of the move.
