Key Factors Driving Demand in the Global Dental Restorative and Regenerative Material Market

The rising incidence of dental diseases is a primary factor fueling the demand for dental restorative and regenerative materials. Common oral health issues such as cavities (tooth decay), gum diseases like periodontitis, and oral cancers remain widespread around the world. The growing urbanization and changing lifestyles continue to contribute to the increased prevalence of these conditions, which require dental intervention. This situation is directly boosting the need for restorative and regenerative dental products. For instance, data from the UK's Office for Health Improvement and Disparities revealed that between 2023 and 2024, 5-year-old children living in the most deprived areas were more than twice as likely (32.2%) to experience dental decay compared to their counterparts in the least deprived areas (13.6%). This disparity highlights the ongoing challenge of dental diseases and underscores the growing demand for effective restorative materials.
