Initiative with NFL Alumni Health is aimed at improving rural healthcare access by powering Health Lives Here consumer app that integrates Einstein AI with independent pharmacies and proprietary patient engagement tools

"We could not be more pleased with the enthusiasm we have from NFLAH around Health Lives

Here," said Gerald Commissiong, Interim Co-CEO of DataMEDS. "With a rich history of serving the independent pharmacy community nationwide, we can leverage those deep relationships as we retool our pharmacy offering and expand our customer base to include the other key stakeholders in rural healthcare. As we integrate telemedicine into our offering around the upcoming launch of our Health Lives Here consumer application, while also beginning to distribute proprietary Tollo Health medical foods and dietary supplements to pharmacists, physicians, and other healthcare providers seeing patients for weight loss therapies or Long COVID, we see tremendous potential for our products together with our technology solution to help rural communities."

Mr. Commissiong continued,

"Acquiring, curating and analyzing the data generated from electronic health records together with wearables and prompted wellness feedback within the Health Lives Here app will provide a unique patient experience where patients will be able to exert greater control over their health data, and ensure that it is curated in such a way to maximize that patient's next physician visit. We believe this is also exactly the type of data that biopharmaceutical manufacturers are looking for. By reducing the time it takes for physicians to get the patient's most up-to-date health snapshot using AI, physicians will have more objective data to make more informed recommendations for their patients, especially those with complex medical conditions such as Long COVID."
