"Every market we're in gets a crew that knows the streets, the buildings, and the local rules," said Caleb Thurman, owner of Sunrise Moving and Packing. "That's what makes a move go right."

This six-state presence reflects steady demand growth across each region, from local apartment moves to long-distance relocations between Sunrise's markets. Customers increasingly expect movers who understand the specifics of their local area, whether that means downtown high-rise access in Kansas City, HOA requirements in a Texas suburb, or seasonal scheduling around Nashville's busy relocation season.

Sunrise Moving and Packing offers local moving, long-distance moving, commercial moving, packing services, storage solutions, and apartment moving in each city it serves. Crews are trained to handle everything from single-room apartment moves to full-scale office relocations, with packing and storage options available for customers who need more flexibility during a move.

Behind each local team is a shared set of standards for how moves get planned, staffed, and carried out. New hires go through hands-on training before they're assigned to a crew, covering everything from proper lifting techniques to how to wrap and protect furniture during transport. Dispatchers coordinate scheduling across markets so customers moving between two Sunrise cities can count on continuity from the first phone call to the final box.

The company has also invested in expanding its storage capacity to meet demand from customers navigating gaps between move-out and move-in dates. Short-term and long-term storage options are available in select markets, giving customers more flexibility when timelines don't line up perfectly.

"Our goal is simple," Thurman added. "Wherever a customer is moving from or to within our network, they should get the same level of care and communication from start to finish."
