The agreement, set to start in October 2026 following the conclusion of the current Project NUMIDIAN contract, provides approximately CAD$296 million (£159 million) in contracted base revenue over 15 years, extending one of Calian's largest defence training programs. In addition, it strengthens the company's long-term position supporting allied military readiness across the UK and Europe.

"Military readiness begins long before a mission starts; it begins with training that prepares troops to operate with confidence in complex, high-pressure environments," said Chris Pogue, President, Defence and Space, Calian. "We're proud to continue supporting the British Army through ACTS alongside Raytheon UK and our Omnia Training partners. This agreement reflects the trust our allies place in Calian's expertise and strengthens our position as a leading provider of collective training and simulation solutions that respond effectively to real-world conditions."

Calian UK's role in ACTS builds on its legacy support to the UK Ministry of Defence and British Army under Project NUMIDIAN, where the company has delivered specialized collective training services designed to expose the British Army to challenging, contemporary threats and enhance operational readiness.

"Omnia Training brings together world-class organisations with proven expertise in military training and simulation," said James Gray, Managing Director and Chief Executive, Raytheon UK. "Our UK based team of innovators, engineers and experts will give soldiers and commanders a new level of training realism and set an example for effective collaboration between the Army and industry."

Collective training brings soldiers, commanders and allied forces together in realistic operational environments to strengthen coordination, interoperability and mission effectiveness before deployment. Through ACTS, Calian will continue delivering specialist collective training services, supporting the modernization of British Army training through advanced digital, synthetic and integrated training capabilities.

The agreement further strengthens Calian's international defence business and reinforces its role supporting allied operational readiness across the UK, Europe and NATO. Drawing on decades of experience in collective training, simulation, systems engineering and interoperability, Calian helps military organizations prepare personnel, commanders and coalition partners to operate effectively across increasingly complex, multi-domain environments.
