The platform says disclosure matters: animation and music production are AI-assisted, while story selection, Scripture handling and final edit stay with people.

21, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Bible with Life has published a description of how artificial intelligence is used in its production process, saying viewers of faith-based media are entitled to know how what they are watching was made.

Audiences deserve to know how the thing in front of them was made, especially when it is Scripture.”

Benny Yu, Founder of Bible with Life

The platform, which produces animated Bible story films and original worship music, said AI tools are used in animation and music production, while story selection, handling of the Scripture text, and the final edit remain human decisions. Its personalized blessing songs are also AI-assisted in production, working from Scripture passages and verse selections prepared in advance.

"Audiences deserve to know how the thing in front of them was made, especially when it is Scripture," said Benny Yu, founder of Bible with Life. "We are a small team. These tools are the reason we can make 45 films instead of two. That is worth saying out loud rather than letting people assume a studio of eighty people is behind it."

The disclosure comes as churches and Christian media organizations weigh how to handle generative tools in worship and teaching contexts. Bible with Life's position, Yu said, is that the technology belongs in production, not in interpretation: no tool decides what a passage means, which verse suits a grieving family, or what makes the final cut.

"The test is not whether a tool touched it," Yu added. "The test is whether the text was handled honestly and whether a person is accountable for the result. On both, the answer here is yes."

The platform's output includes 45 animated Bible story films, 63 original worship tracks across three albums, a free daily Bible verse email, and personalized Scripture blessing songs. The films and music are free to watch and stream at biblewithlife.com.
