

Shifting Work Habits Drive Professionals to Historic River Towns

MILFORD, PA, UNITED STATES, August 18, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The traditional office environment continues to change as remote work remains a permanent fixture for many professionals. According to the Pew Research Center, roughly a third of U.S. workers with jobs that can be done remotely now work from home all the time. This shift has changed daily routines, allowing individuals to work from locations outside of their primary residence. Rather than commuting to corporate office buildings, employees are bringing their laptops to new environments that offer both functional workspaces and immediate outdoor recreation.

This flexibility has led to an increase in professionals traveling to historic river towns to complete their workday. These areas provide the necessary high-speed Wi-Fi alongside access to high-altitude hiking trails and local craft breweries. For this reason, professionals are searching for remote work retreats Poconos to change their daily environment without taking paid time off. By working in these smaller towns, individuals can finish their daily tasks and step outside to access outdoor activities or local dining options.

The Tom Quick Inn is one business adjusting to this type of traveler. Located in the walkable downtown area of Milford, Pennsylvania, the property functions as a base for remote workers. Guests can use the historic veranda to work on a laptop and take phone calls during the day. When the workday concludes, visitors can walk from the property directly to the nearby Milford Knob Trail for an afternoon hike before returning to the town center for evening activities.
