

Legacy Health Works Expands On-Site and Virtual Training for Healthcare Teams

Family-built company turns professional expertise, published books and lived experience into practical training for healthcare professionals and organizations.

DALLAS, TX, UNITED STATES, August 20, 2026

/EINPresswire.com/ -- Legacy Health Works is expanding its role in the healthcare community by building a broader on-site and virtual training platform designed to help healthcare professionals and organizations strengthen communication, professional development, workforce readiness, and the human side of care.

While the family-built company provides BLS training and provider credentialing support, its larger mission reaches beyond individual services.

Legacy Health Works is developing educational experiences that transform professional expertise, published books, real-world experiences, and meaningful conversations into practical training healthcare organizations can bring directly to their teams.

"BLS and credentialing are important parts of what we do, but they are not the complete story of Legacy Health Works," said Kevin D. Williams, author, communication educator, and co-founder of Legacy Health Works. "Our bigger vision is to become a place healthcare organizations can turn to when they want their people to learn, communicate better, grow professionally, and create stronger experiences for the people they serve."

Turning Published Expertise Into Professional Education

A central part of the Legacy Health Works model is converting intellectual property and lived experience into educational programs.

Williams is the author of Clarity in Care, a communication resource focused on helping healthcare professionals address misunderstandings, strengthen trust, and create clearer conversations between providers, patients, colleagues, and organizations.

His daughter, Kylar Denae Williams, is the author of Two Homes, One Heart, which explores co-parenting and family transitions from a child's perspective.

The book creates opportunities for conversations involving therapists, counselors, social workers, educators, mental health professionals, family advocates, and others who work with children and families.

Legacy Health Works is taking the ideas behind both books beyond the page through workshops, facilitated discussions, speaking engagements, professional development programs, and customized training.

A book can become a workshop.

A professional experience can become a case discussion.

A difficult conversation can become a teaching opportunity.

And an organization facing a communication challenge can bring education directly to its workforce.

Legacy Health Works is more than BLS. We help healthcare organizations educate their teams, strengthen communication, and develop professionals through practical on-site and virtual training.”

On-Site and Virtual Training for Healthcare Teams

Legacy Health Works is building its education platform around flexibility.

Organizations can explore on-site or virtual training based on the needs of their teams, eliminating the assumption that meaningful professional development must always take place at an outside conference or large training event.

Programs can address areas including healthcare communication, provider-patient relationships, difficult conversations, interpersonal communication, family-centered communication, professional development, team communication, BLS education, provider credentialing, and other workforce-related topics.

The goal is to create practical education that participants can apply after the training ends.

“Information alone does not always change how people communicate,” Williams said. “People need opportunities to examine real situations, hear different perspectives, ask questions, and understand how their communication is experienced by someone else. That is where education becomes useful.”

A Father-and-Daughter Perspective

The company’s education model is also influenced by the different perspectives Kevin and Kylar bring to their work.

Together, they use professional knowledge, authorship, personal experiences, and generational viewpoints to create conversations around healthcare, communication, families, and professional development.

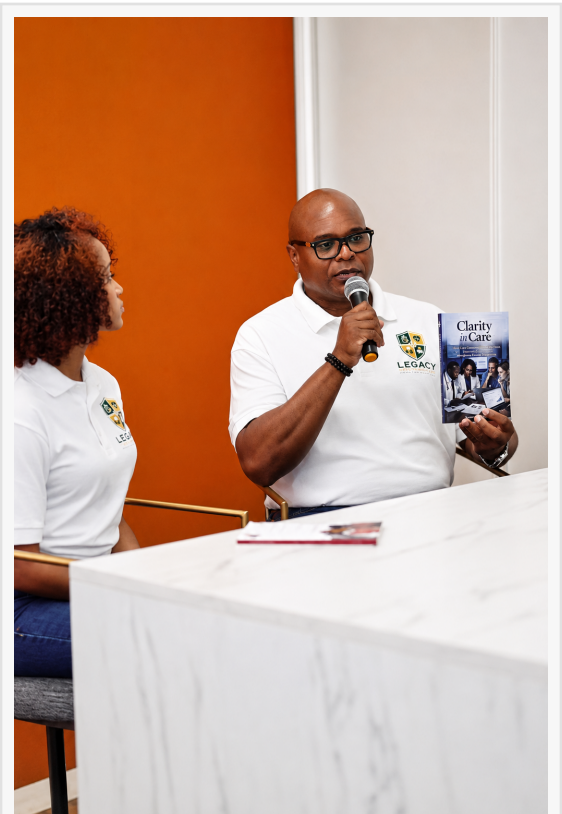

Kylar also brings experience in provider credentialing, workshop facilitation, speaking, and podcast hosting.

“People connect differently when education feels relevant to what they are actually experiencing,” Kylar said. “We want our programs to create conversations people remember and give them information they can take back into their organizations, practices, and communities.”

Those conversations also extend to the Legacy Lounge, the company’s healthcare-focused podcast and discussion platform, where healthcare professionals and experts can share experiences, perspectives, and lessons affecting their industries and communities.

More Than a Certification Provider

The expansion represents a deliberate shift in how Legacy Health Works wants to be understood.

The company is not abandoning BLS instruction or provider credentialing.

Instead, those services are becoming part of a larger ecosystem centered on credentialing, training, communication, and education.

“We don’t want healthcare professionals to think of Legacy Health Works only as the place where someone gets a BLS certification,” Williams said. “We want organizations to think of us as a resource they can bring in when they want to educate their workforce, strengthen communication, develop their people, and build stronger professional relationships.”

Legacy Health Works plans to continue developing partnerships with healthcare organizations, private practices, professional associations, behavioral and mental health professionals, educators, providers, and community organizations seeking practical education for their teams.

The company’s long-term objective is to help create healthcare environments where professionals are not only technically prepared but also better equipped to communicate, connect, educate, and lead.
