Using Documentary Production,
Environmental Storytelling, and Community
Engagement to Amplify Underrepresented
Voices and Inspire Meaningful Social Impact

Pembroke Pines, Florida — Chloe Barnett is an Emmy Award-winning storyteller, documentary producer, and community advocate whose career sits at the intersection of media, environmental awareness, social impact, and community engagement. Drawing inspiration from her Costa Rican heritage, Florida's cultural diversity, and the natural beauty of the Everglades and surrounding oceans, Chloe has developed a distinctive approach to storytelling that connects people, culture, and the environment.

Her commitment to service began at an early age through community involvement, environmental restoration efforts, and her experience with the Girl Scouts. Those formative experiences helped establish her belief that storytelling can do more than inform an audience—it can encourage awareness, create conversations, and inspire people to take meaningful action.

A magna cum laude graduate of Florida International University with a Bachelor of Science in Broadcast Journalism and Anthropology, Chloe has built her professional career around amplifying voices and perspectives that deserve greater visibility. Her work reflects a particular interest in environmental justice, women's issues, education, and community-focused initiatives.

As a Producer at Fuxion, Inc., Chloe co-produced and hosted the Emmy Award-winning documentary Women of the Watershed, a film highlighting women leading restoration and conservation efforts throughout the Florida Everglades. The project brought attention to the individuals working to protect one of South Florida's most important ecosystems while demonstrating the critical role women play in environmental stewardship.

The documentary received recognition at international and environmental film festivals, including the Montreal Women's Film Festival and the Florida Environmental Film Festival. Through the project, Chloe demonstrated how compelling storytelling can bring complex environmental issues to broader audiences while celebrating the people working to create positive change.

Her production portfolio also includes The Reading Reboot, Who Cares for Mom?, State of Rodeo, and Broken Ground. These projects span education, maternal health, rodeo culture, and archaeology, reflecting her ability to move across diverse subject areas while maintaining a consistent focus on stories with social relevance, human impact, and compelling real-world narratives.

Chloe attributes her success to the strong support system and community that has surrounded her throughout her life. Her family has been her greatest source of encouragement, while friends and mentors have provided guidance, perspective, and opportunities to grow. Growing up with a father who championed female empowerment and a mother deeply involved in the community exposed Chloe to diverse perspectives that shaped her values, confidence, and understanding of her purpose.

She believes those relationships have reinforced an important lesson: meaningful careers are rarely built alone. Mentorship and community have played an important role in her development, and she hopes to extend that same support to others.

For young women entering media and related fields, Chloe encourages them to remain committed to the work they believe in while understanding that professional journeys do not always follow a straight path. She emphasizes resilience, adaptability, and the willingness to pivot when opportunities or circumstances change.

She also believes mentorship should be embraced across genders and backgrounds. Both men and women, she says, have an opportunity to support emerging professionals and share the perspectives and experiences that can help the next generation navigate challenging environments.

Chloe recognizes that the media industry continues to face challenges, including the persistent male dominance in many professional spaces and disparities affecting women. She also sees a broader challenge in the lack of awareness many communities have about resources and support available to them.

At the same time, she sees tremendous opportunity in the power of media and storytelling. Documentaries, digital platforms, and community-centered storytelling can bring important issues into public conversations, connect audiences with resources, and encourage greater engagement. For Chloe, the goal is not simply to tell stories, but to create work that contributes to meaningful, impact-driven initiatives.

Her values are rooted in making a positive impact, inclusivity, perseverance, and mentorship. Since her time as a Girl Scout, she has carried with her the belief in “making the world a better place.” That principle continues to influence the way she approaches both her professional work and community involvement.

Alongside her media career, Chloe works with Mujeres Latinas Empowering Women, supporting programs designed to empower girls, women, and families in South Broward County. Her previous involvement with the National Museum of the American Latino Young Ambassadors Program and the Smithsonian Folklife Festival further expanded her understanding of culture, community, and the importance of representation.

These experiences have strengthened Chloe’s commitment to becoming a community-conscious leader who uses communication as a tool for advocacy and education. Whether she is producing a documentary, supporting a community initiative, or mentoring others, she remains focused on creating connections between people and the issues that matter.

Guided by her belief that storytelling can inspire awareness and action, Chloe Barnett continues to develop projects that uplift marginalized communities, encourage environmental stewardship, and highlight the people working to create positive change. Her journey demonstrates the potential of media to serve not only as a platform for storytelling, but also as a catalyst for education, advocacy, and lasting community impact.
