

Leaguebase Launches a Private Social Network Built for Fantasy Football Leagues

New platform gives fantasy leagues a home for the conversations, rivalries, recaps and history that otherwise disappear in the group chat.

AUSTIN, TX, UNITED STATES, August 26, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Fantasy football leagues create years of rivalries, trash talk, trades, inside jokes and unforgettable moments—but much of that history lives in a group chat, where it eventually disappears. Today, Leaguebase announced the launch of a private social network built specifically for fantasy football leagues, creating a home for league conversations, weekly recaps, power rankings, trade reactions, awards, analytics and history that carries across seasons.

The idea grew out of founder Kevin Yip's own passion for football and fantasy sports, and the friendships he has built through the game. An avid football fan and fantasy player, Yip saw firsthand how fantasy football gives friends a reason to stay connected, compete and create traditions year after year. He also saw how much of what makes those leagues special gets lost across group chats, spreadsheets and existing fantasy platforms.

"Fantasy football has always been about more than winning to me. It's the trash talk, the rivalries, the draft trip memories, and the stories you're still giving your friends a hard time about years later. It gives us a reason to stay connected," said Kevin Yip, founder of Leaguebase. "I love that part of fantasy football, and it's what inspired Leaguebase. I wanted to build a place that captures everything that makes a league special and lets that history grow with you season after season."

Leaguebase gives fantasy leagues a home for the conversations, rivalries, recaps and history that otherwise disappear in the group chat.

Leaguebase is designed to complement, not replace, the platforms people already use to play fantasy football. It connects to leagues on Sleeper, Yahoo and ESPN, then creates a social layer around the competition. The platform turns league data and activity into content that gives members more reasons to engage throughout the week.

Leaguebase features include weekly recaps, power rankings, trade reactions, matchup storylines, awards and league-specific analytics, alongside a record of the league's history, rivalries and memorable moments. Instead of asking commissioners to manually create recaps or keep years of league history alive, Leaguebase helps capture and generate that experience as the league evolves.

Your fantasy platform runs the league. Leaguebase is where the league lives.

Leaguebase is launching at the height of fantasy football draft season as the title sponsor of FantasyPros Fantasy Fest on August 26, introducing the platform directly to fantasy football players and commissioners.

Fantasy football platforms such as Sleeper, Yahoo and ESPN handle the fundamentals of playing the game including managing rosters, scoring, drafts, waivers and matchups. Group chats handle much of the conversation around it.

Leaguebase is built for the social experience of a league: the trade everyone argued about, the improbable comeback, the controversial power ranking, the running joke and the rivalry that's been going for five seasons.

By preserving those moments and using each league's own activity to fuel new content and conversation, Leaguebase gives fantasy leagues a social experience and memory that can build from one season to the next.
