published The State of U.S. Prediction Market Tax and Accounting 2026, a report addressing tax and accounting matters arising in prediction market trading.

The report covers tax classification, loss treatment, accounting, transaction reconciliation, information reporting and related compliance considerations.

Prediction market trading has expanded rapidly across a growing number of venues and products. As the market develops, firms are encountering tax and accounting issues that require careful treatment under existing rules and reporting practices.

As prediction market activity grows, tax treatment, accounting, reporting and reconciliation are becoming more significant for firms operating at scale. The report examines these issues as trading models and market access continue to develop.

“In our work with trading firms, including market makers, we're seeing firsthand the tax characterization, accounting, reporting and reconciliation issues that come with this activity,” said Patrick Camuso, CPA, founder and managing director of Camuso CPA. “As transaction volumes and trading complexity increase, the tax and accounting issues become increasingly consequential. This report reflects the issues we're addressing in practice as the market continues to develop.”

The State of U.S. Prediction Market Tax and Accounting 2026 brings together Camuso CPA's current work and research on tax characterization, transaction reconciliation, accounting, information reporting and related implementation issues arising in prediction market trading. The publication also reflects Camuso CPA's broader work in emerging financial markets, where new products and trading activity can present new tax and accounting questions.
