Par x Design Takes Golf Photography to the Streets With The City Collection: Chapter 01 New York

The new golf art collection reframes the golfer's journey, documenting the streets, architecture and everyday rituals that connect city life to the course.

SAN FRANCISCO, CA, UNITED STATES, September 3, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Par x Design has launched The City Collection, a new golf photography and wall art series documenting what it feels like to experience golf through the world's great cities.

The first chapter begins in New York.

Golf in New York starts long before the first tee. It moves through streets, subway platforms and crowded sidewalks, with the journey becoming part of the experience.

Chapter 01: New York captures that relationship through original photography, film and design created throughout the city. Golf bags, clubs and players are placed against a visual language of concrete, steel, glass, subway tile and skyline.

"We wanted to capture the feeling of being a golfer in New York, not simply photograph golf in New York," said Eric Woo, founder of Par x Design. "There's something distinct about carrying your clubs through a city of millions of people, getting on a train and heading somewhere to play. Those moments belong to the game too."

Golf, Through the City

Traditional golf photography tends to focus on the course itself.

The City Collection widens the frame.

Rather than documenting a specific hole or landscape, the series looks at the places, movement and rituals surrounding the round. In New York, that means golf existing within one of the most recognizable urban environments in the world.

The contrast is central to the work. Familiar golf forms sit against street markings, architecture, transit systems and the density of the city.

The result is a portrait of golf shaped by place.
