The Vivian Hanna Foundation was established by John Hanna, MD, in honor of his late wife, Vivian, whose breast cancer was detected too late. Early detection saves lives, and the foundation focuses on closing the critical access gap by funding full screenings, mobile community days, and complete diagnostic and surgical follow-up care so that no woman faces financial barriers to early detection.

"When breast cancer is caught early, survival rates and treatment outcomes improve dramatically, but cost and logistics prevent too many women from getting screened," said John Hanna, MD, founder. "We bring the mobile bus directly into the community to ensure that women have immediate access to the screenings and ongoing support they deserve."

"Our goal with bringing the MammoLink Pink Bus straight to Trinity is to make early detection completely frictionless for women who might otherwise go without," said Justin Miller, Marketing Director and Public Relations Officer for the foundation. "By removing cost and access barriers, we are empowering local women to take charge of their health with dignity and ease."

Local residents interested in scheduling a screening can contact the Internal Medicine MD Trinity office directly at (727) 376-3760. For media inquiries or further partnership information, the foundation's marketing and public relations office is also available.
