

Precision Telemed Expands Into Medical Skincare and Introduces Three-Month Supply Options

Physician-led telehealth company adds compounded copper peptide cream and three-month supply options to support treatment continuity

A prescription changes what is possible. It also changes who should be involved in the decision, which is why this runs through a physician rather than a shopping cart.”

physician-led telehealth company serving patients nationwide, today announced an expansion of its clinical programs, including entry into medical skincare and the introduction of three-month supply options for eligible programs.

The expansion reflects the company's move into adjacent areas of preventive and aesthetic medicine, delivered through the same physician-supervised telehealth model.

Medical Skincare: Compounded Copper Peptide Cream

Precision Telemed has launched a compounded copper peptide, or GHK-Cu, cream prescribed by licensed providers and prepared by a state-licensed 503A compounding pharmacy.

Copper peptides have become one of the more widely discussed ingredients in skincare, though most consumer products contain concentrations well below what a physician can prescribe. Precision Telemed's formulation is available only following an online evaluation and prescription from a licensed provider.

“Skincare is one of the few categories where people are routinely sold a diluted version of something real,” said JP Rius, founder of Precision Telemed. “A prescription changes what is possible. It also changes who should be involved in the decision, which is why this runs through a physician rather than a shopping cart.”

Three-Month Supply Programs

Precision Telemed has also introduced three-month supply options across eligible prescription programs, addressing a practical problem the company observed in its own patient population: treatment interruptions between refills.

“The savings matter, but they are not the main reason we built this,” said Rius. “The bigger issue is continuity. Removing a monthly reorder from that equation is a small operational change that can make a real difference in whether someone remains engaged with a program.”

Participation in a three-month supply program remains subject to provider approval and any clinical monitoring or follow-up requirements established by the prescribing provider.

The company plans to extend three-month supply options to additional programs, including hormone therapy and peptide therapy, over the coming months.
