Sued.com Listed For Sale With URLs.com Brokerage

Exclusive representation begins for the short legal brand Sued.com

URLs.com is the exclusive broker of Sued.com

NEW YORK, NY, UNITED STATES, September 10, 2026 / EINPresswire.com/ -- URLs.com today began exclusive brokerage of Sued.com, a four-letter dictionary .com intended for law firms, legal-tech companies, and consumer brands that need a name people can read, recall, and type after a single glance.

Sued.com is a real English verb on the web's default extension. Every letter-only four-letter .com, 456,976 combinations, is already registered. Names of this length reach the market only when an owner chooses to sell.

WHY THE NAME CARRIES WEIGHT

Legal search is among the costliest advertising categories online. Analyses of Google Ads place many lawyer and personal-injury keywords in the $50 to $200-plus range per click, with some accident terms clearing several hundred dollars. A short exact-match .com can support organic search, paid media, and answers from large language models by matching the language people already use.

The addressable market is U.S. legal services and the adjacent legal-technology, insurance, and claims businesses that compete for those high-intent queries.

- Four letters: readable from a billboard, radio read, or lock screen
- Dictionary word: no spelling tax and no invented brand to teach
- .com: the extension users type when they guess a URL
- Category fit: maps to litigation, defense, plaintiff work, and legal media

GARBUTT ON RECALL AND SEARCH COSTS

> Most people will never hear your slogan twice. They will see four letters on a highway board or in an AI citation. Sued.com is the kind of name that survives the glimpse.”

“Most people will never hear your slogan twice,” said Jeff Garbutt, founder and Broker-in-Chief of URLs.com. “They will see four letters on a highway board or in an AI citation. Sued.com is the kind of name that survives that first look.”

Garbutt added: “Law firms already pay some of the highest cost-per-click rates on the planet. Owning the word people search is one of the few assets that compounds while ad rates keep rising.”
