WAXHAW, NC, UNITED STATES, September 10, 2026 / EINPresswire.com/ -- When the temperatures in Waxhaw begin their seasonal drop and the evenings stretch longer into the dark, homeowners across Union County start thinking about what their backyard is actually missing. For many, the answer is a fire feature. JH Landscapes, the Waxhaw-based outdoor construction company serving the Greater Charlotte region, installs custom fire pits and outdoor fireplaces for residential properties across North Carolina and South Carolina, and is booking installations for homeowners planning to add a permanent fire feature.

Fire pits and outdoor fireplaces are not the same project, and the distinction matters before a single shovel hits the ground. A fire pit, whether built from natural stone, concrete block, or pavers, creates a low, centralized heat source designed for open gathering. Guests sit around it on all sides, making it well suited for larger groups and informal outdoor settings. An outdoor fireplace, by contrast, functions more like its interior counterpart: a vertical, chimney-ventilated structure that directs smoke upward and heat outward in a defined direction, lending a more formal and architectural presence to the space. JH Landscapes builds both, and the team works with homeowners during the planning phase to match the right fire feature to the way a specific yard is used, how the surrounding hardscape is laid out, and what the long-term goal for the space looks like.

The build process for a permanent fire feature starts well before any material is set. Site assessment identifies the appropriate clearance distances from structures, overhead cover, and planted areas. Base preparation is the foundation of a long-lasting installation: compacted gravel sub-base, proper drainage planning, and a concrete footing where the structure demands it. Skipping any part of that foundation work produces a fire feature that shifts, cracks, or deteriorates within a few seasons in Piedmont clay soil, where the ground moves considerably through wet and dry cycles. The team at JH Landscapes in Waxhaw, NC builds for those conditions specifically, using materials and methods suited to Zone 8a weather and the clay-heavy soils that define most Union County properties.

Fire features are most often integrated into a larger hardscape design rather than installed as standalone elements. A fire pit placed on bare ground without a defined patio or seating surface around it loses much of its functional value. JH Landscapes frequently pairs fire pit and fireplace installations with paver patios, retaining and seating walls, and outdoor lighting systems, so the finished space works as a complete environment rather than a collection of unconnected elements. A built-in seating wall around a fire pit, for example, eliminates the need to drag chairs onto the lawn, defines the gathering space visually, and provides a durable, weather-resistant surface that holds up far longer than portable furniture placed on soft ground.

Outdoor fireplaces carry additional design considerations. Because they function as a permanent architectural feature, proportion and placement relative to the home's exterior matter. A fireplace that is undersized for its patio looks like an afterthought. One that is positioned without accounting for prevailing wind direction becomes a smoke problem rather than a comfort solution. JH Landscapes approaches outdoor fireplace projects with the same documented planning process the company applies to all construction work: site assessment, material selection, scope documentation, and a defined timeline before work begins.

Fire features support outdoor gathering in the Carolinas when evenings are cool enough for comfortable outdoor seating. A functioning fire pit or fireplace can extend that time by several hours. JH Landscapes is scheduling installations and encourages homeowners considering a fire pit or outdoor fireplace to reach out early, as project slots fill.

"A fire feature changes how a backyard gets used," said a JH Landscapes spokesperson. "We see it on almost every project where we add one. The space that sat unused after dark becomes the place where people actually spend time. Getting the foundation work right and integrating it properly with the surrounding patio is what makes that happen for the long term, not just the first season."

JH Landscapes operates as a founder-led company with three full service divisions covering construction, hardscaping, and landscaping. Each project is managed through a single team and a single schedule, with documented plans, material selections, and timelines established before work begins. The company holds an A+ rating from the Better Business Bureau of Southern Piedmont and Western North Carolina and serves residential and commercial clients across the Greater Charlotte region in both North Carolina and South Carolina.
