New Book Reveals a Repeatable Blueprint for Finding Tomorrow's 10X Stocks Before They Explode

Attorney, economist, and CPA Frank Igwealor publishes "The 10X Stock Finder," a process-driven guide to hunting multibaggers while they still look ordinary

The 10X Stock Finder

LOS ANGELES, CA, UNITED STATES, September 10, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- A small number of public companies create nearly all long-term stock-market wealth. Most investors never own them until the move is obvious — and expensive. The 10X Stock Finder: The Blueprint for Hunting Tomorrow's Multibaggers Before They Explode, the new book by Frank Ikechukwu Igwealor, argues that those outliers are not random. They leave a recognizable footprint: modest size, accelerating fundamentals, an expanding addressable market, early institutional accumulation, and a valuation that still has room to re-rate.

The book, published in the United States with ISBN 979-8-951213-04-4, is written for serious individual investors who will do primary research rather than chase headlines. It does not promise certainty. It offers a six-stage operating system: screen the universe, analyze the business and its moat, build conviction with a written thesis and bear case, size positions according to power-law mathematics, hold through the 30–50 percent drawdowns that even great winners endure, and exit when the thesis — not the ticker — breaks.

Igwealor grounds the method in two engines that almost every historic ten-bagger combined: explosive earnings growth and multiple expansion. A company that roughly triples earnings while the market pays three times more for those earnings produces something close to a 10× return. Either engine alone rarely does. The author cites Hendrik Bessembinder's research showing that since 1926 only about 4 percent of U.S. stocks generated virtually all net shareholder wealth above Treasury bills. The implication is stark: random picking is a losing game; a disciplined hunt for the right tail is the only rational strategy.

“You cannot predict which company will become a ten-bagger, and you do not need to,” Igwealor writes. “You need only identify businesses that share the DNA of past multibaggers, own a diversified basket of them, size so that one winner can matter, and hold long enough for compounding to work.

”The manuscript walks readers through market-cap and float constraints, total addressable market, secular themes and S-curve adoption, insider buying, quiet institutional accumulation, unit economics, early moats, founder alignment, alternative data, catalyst mapping, and technical confirmation. It includes a 100-point scorecard, research-journal templates, weekly and monthly workflows, and an exit architecture that separates ordinary volatility from a broken thesis. Case studies range from Monster Beverage and NVIDIA to cautionary names such as Peloton, Cisco at the 2000 peak, Celsius after its run, and Super Micro after its break.

Igwealor is a California-licensed attorney, economist, Certified Public Accountant, Certified Management Accountant, and Certified Financial Manager, as well as a licensed real estate broker. He has served as officer and director of public and private companies across the United States, Europe, Asia, the Middle East, and Africa. The book is explicitly educational and not financial advice. It warns that small- and micro-cap investing can produce total loss, that most candidates will fail, and that past performance is no guarantee of future results.The work is aimed at investors willing to read 10-Ks, listen to earnings calls, keep a journal, and tolerate discomfort. It is not a tip sheet. Its claim is more modest and more useful: a repeatable process that tilts the odds toward the rare companies still hiding in plain sight.The 10X Stock Finder is available as a first edition 2026 release. Review copies and interview requests may be directed to the author.
