

InventionHome® Inventor Spotlight: Wood Stove and Campfire Cooker

PITTSBURGH, PA, UNITED STATES,
September 15, 2026 /

EINPresswire.com/ -- The idea for the Wood Stove and Campfire Cooker came from a common problem with cooking on a wood-burning stove. While many wood stoves are designed to accommodate cooking, grease splatter and food residue can be difficult to clean from the stove's surface. Brett C. from Colorado wanted to create a separate cooking surface that could be placed over the stove, allowing people to cook without leaving the same mess behind.

The patent-pending Wood Stove and Campfire Cooker is a removable metal cooking surface designed to sit on top of a wood-burning stove. The cooker creates a dedicated area for preparing food while helping protect the stove underneath from grease and spills. Its adjustable legs can also be used over a campfire, allowing users to adjust the cooking height to help manage heat and accommodate uneven outdoor terrain.

The invention is designed with a wide range of users in mind such as campers, hunters, outdoor enthusiasts, and people who live in rural areas where winter power outages may be more common. It could also provide an alternative cooking option during an outage or simply for those who enjoy using their wood stove as a cooking surface. Optional trivets can provide additional control over heat when the cooker is used on a wood stove.

Stability was another important consideration in the development of the Wood Stove and Campfire Cooker. The adjustable legs are designed to help keep the cooker securely positioned rather than allowing it to tip or slide, which could create a safety hazard around a hot stove or campfire. Brett hopes to make cooking over wood heat a cleaner, more stable, and more versatile experience by combining a protective cooking surface with adjustable outdoor functionality.
