Before the First Fire: ServicePros on Chimney and Vent Prep in the Northwest

ServicePros shares real job photos and questions about chimney cleaning, repairs and dryer vent service for Oregon and southwest Washington homes.

PORTLAND, OR, UNITED STATES, September 28, 2026 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Before lighting a fireplace for the season, it is useful to know what a chimney service includes. The same planning can bring an overlooked household system into view: the dryer vent. ServicePros, a chimney and duct service company covering the I-5 corridor from Longview, Washington, through the Portland and Vancouver area to Salem, Oregon, is sharing what homeowners can ask before booking either service, illustrated with photographs from its own jobs.

What does a chimney cleaning include? A homeowner can ask whether the visit covers the firebox, the smoke shelf, the flue and the cap and crown, and whether the sweep is done from the roof, from the fireplace, or both. ServicePros publishes chimney cleaning as a service, and homeowners can ask for photographs documenting the areas assessed and the work completed.

What happens if the technician finds damage? A cracked crown, a missing cap, failed flashing or a damaged liner are conditions a homeowner can ask to have documented and quoted separately from the cleaning. ServicePros lists a chimney repair line covering repair, leaks, caps, crowns, flashing, liners and masonry.

What does a dryer vent cleaning cover? The vent run extends from the transition duct behind the dryer through the wall to an exterior termination, and lint can settle anywhere along it. A homeowner can ask whether the full run and the termination are included. The accompanying client-supplied photograph shows lint at an exterior dryer vent during a ServicePros job. Longer drying times and a dryer that feels unusually hot are details worth mentioning when booking.

Are air ducts on the list too? ServicePros also publishes air duct cleaning. Naming the requested service when booking, chimney, dryer vent, air ducts or a combination, helps the office send the right equipment and write a scope that matches the visit.

What should the homeowner expect from the estimate? The company advertises free estimates and same-day service when the schedule permits, and states that its technicians are background-checked. Availability for a specific address is confirmed when booking.

ServicePros provides chimney, air duct, and dryer vent services in Oregon and southwest Washington.

The service territory follows the I-5 corridor and its surrounding communities from Longview in the north, through the Portland and Vancouver metro, to Salem in the south.
