Unlike hit-count-based reflex-ball challenges such as those offered by Boxbollen, the TekXYZ event focused on freestyle performances and creative expression. "We chose freestyle because we wanted players to express their creativity and individuality, beyond simply showing how fast they could hit the ball,” said Mingxing (George) Yuan, founder of TekXYZ. “They can bring their own dance steps, shadowboxing footwork or other skills into their performance and develop the control to make the ball move the way they imagine. To us, that freedom to create, enjoy playing, and entertain others is the heart of freestyle.”

Videos submitted to the challenge were ranked by the community engagement they received on the TekXYZ App, including likes, comments, and saves. Chile's Benjalao secured first place with an engagement score of 790, combining rapid punching sequences with controlled pauses, catches, and head control. Austria's Motaku finished second with a score of 584, featuring rhythmic footwork, jumping movements, and dance-like transitions. Puerto Rico's maxthegreat placed third with a score of 539, demonstrating boxing combinations and fluid changes of direction. The three winners received $2,000, $1,000, and $500, respectively.

Participants came from at least 11 countries and regions across five continents, including the United States, Chile, Austria, Guinea, and China. The event brought together players of different ages and experience levels, from young beginners to experienced enthusiasts.

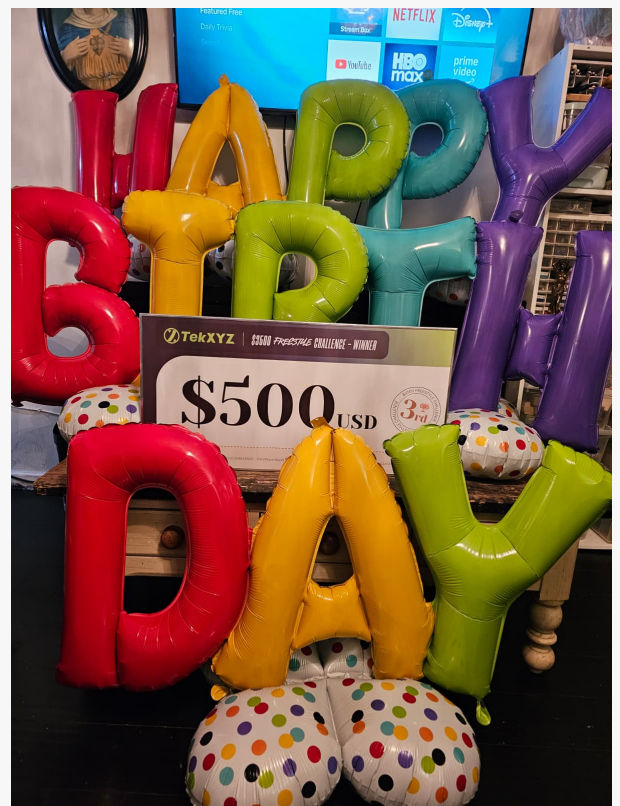

The 88 submitted videos received a combined 1,575 likes, 795 comments, and 340 saves. Beyond lively discussions about individual performances, users exchanged tips on training techniques, equipment selection, and specific movements and combinations. Some younger participants also incorporated movements and techniques demonstrated by more experienced players into their own performances.

Over five enthusiasts and participants have told TekXYZ that reflex ball practice has provided companionship in their everyday lives and a positive distraction during difficult times. These periods also gave them time to practice and explore freestyle. One enthusiast, Scott, described spending an hour or two absorbed in hitting the ball, comparing the experience to meditation as his everyday worries faded into the background.

"We were excited to see so many creative performances that exceeded our expectations," said Mingxing (George) Yuan. "The response has reinforced our commitment to bringing more people together through future freestyle events."
