

Winter Fatigue Is Real: Artisan Venture Tours Says a Corporate Retreat Can Bring the Spark Back

LIVINGSTON, MT, UNITED STATES,
September 25, 2026 /

EINPresswire.com/ -- Fall has arrived, bringing cooler mornings, changing leaves, and the first reminders that winter isn't far behind. For businesses, it can also be the perfect time to start thinking ahead to the months when shorter days, colder weather, and repetitive routines can leave teams craving a change of scenery.

Artisan Venture Tours, a Livingston, Montana-based corporate retreat planning company, is encouraging organizations to use the fall planning season to create something their employees can look forward to during the long winter months ahead.

Change of Scenery: Taking the team outside is a fun way to invigorate the mind and enhance creativity. Going outdoors for your next strategic planning meeting will help refresh and clear your mind before clearly defining goals and objectives.

A thoughtfully planned winter retreat can provide more than a few days away from the office. It can give employees a chance to step outside their normal routines, reconnect with coworkers, experience something new, and return feeling refreshed for the months ahead.

Planning Ahead for the Winter Slump

Winter can feel long, especially once the excitement of fall fades and weeks of cold weather and shorter daylight hours settle in.

Planning a retreat now puts something exciting on the calendar before that seasonal monotony arrives.

Whether a company chooses to escape the cold altogether with sunshine and warm weather or embrace winter with mountains, skiing, snowshoeing, fireside gatherings, and cozy accommodations, the change of environment can give teams a welcome reset.

"Fall is a great time for companies to start thinking about how they want to keep their teams connected and energized through the winter," said Jon Hesse, President and Founder of Artisan Venture Tours. "A retreat gives people something to anticipate, but the impact goes beyond the trip itself. It's about creating shared experiences and relationships that employees bring back to work with them."

Giving Teams Something to Look Forward To

Part of the value of a retreat begins well before anyone boards a plane.

Having an experience on the calendar can create anticipation during a season that otherwise tends to feel repetitive. Instead of looking at several uninterrupted months of winter, employees have a destination, experience, or adventure ahead of them.

For remote and hybrid teams, retreats can also provide valuable face-to-face time that doesn't happen during the normal workweek. For teams that work together every day, getting outside the office creates opportunities to connect without the usual meetings, deadlines, and responsibilities.

Shared meals, adventures, conversations, and even unexpected moments along the way can become the experiences coworkers continue talking about long after they return home.

Escape Winter - Or Embrace It

Teamwork reaches new heights!

A winter retreat doesn't necessarily mean escaping to somewhere tropical.

Some teams may want exactly that: sunshine, beaches, outdoor dining, water activities, and a few days away from snow and freezing temperatures. Others may prefer to lean into the season with a mountain retreat featuring skiing, snowboarding, winter excursions, cozy lodges, and evenings around the fire.

Artisan Venture Tours creates customized retreats around each company's goals, personality, group size, and budget rather than taking a one-size-fits-all approach.

More Than a Trip

For companies, a retreat can also be an investment in something increasingly difficult to create during an ordinary workday: genuine connection.

Employees have an opportunity to experience one another outside their usual roles. Conversations happen naturally. New relationships form. Existing ones deepen. And teams return home with shared experiences that become part of the company's culture.

Artisan Venture Tours manages the details behind those experiences, including destination selection, accommodations, transportation, dining, activities, meeting logistics, and on-site coordination.

With winter approaching, the company says now is the time for organizations to begin planning - before calendars fill, availability tightens, and the long season arrives.

Because when winter starts to feel endless, sometimes having somewhere unforgettable to go can make all the difference.
